

You can make a difference

The NSW SES has reimagined volunteering, with new opportunities for community members to become involved. Spontaneous volunteering is flexible so whether you have an hour, a day or a week, you can make a difference with the NSW SES. As a Spontaneous Volunteer you will start an exciting new journey, challenge yourself and use your skills to help your local community.

In return for volunteering your time, you will receive training, learn new skills and make friends with other volunteers from your community. You will gain a sense of satisfaction from helping others and being part of a great team. Your volunteer experience with the NSW SES will give you a new perspective and appreciation for your community.

Hands up to help your community

Spontaneous Volunteers are community members who volunteer in one-off events to support the NSW State Emergency Service (NSW SES) during emergencies. Spontaneous Volunteers work closely with the NSW SES and local communities before, during and after disasters.

As a Spontaneous Volunteer, you can get involved in a diverse range of roles which do not require a set of qualifications or any previous experience as a NSW SES volunteer.

Outside of emergency response, your existing skills and experience could also be utilised to build capability and preparedness. Becoming a Spontaneous Volunteer with the NSW SES is a great way to gain experience in a new area, learn new skills and be part of your community without any ongoing commitment.

Case Study

In February 2013, a tornado destroyed parts of Kiama on the NSW South Coast, causing catastrophic damage to many homes and businesses. A group of local residents got together to provide urgent relief efforts to the affected areas. These Spontaneous Volunteers had never volunteered with the NSW SES before and proved to be a valuable resource for sudden surge capacity events such as the Kiama tornado.

What can Spontaneous Volunteers do?

As a Spontaneous Volunteer with the NSW SES, you will be supporting your community during times of need. You could assist in preparing the community for a storm or flood, sharing safety information within the community, cleaning up after a disaster, and supporting NSW SES volunteers on the ground.

During the Kiama tornado I was unable to work as the weather was too bad. As a builder, I knew I could help those people whose homes were affected by the tornado. I registered as a Spontaneous Volunteer and put my skills to use, helping out where I could. Although it was a distressing time, it was very rewarding to be able to help those in need and be part of a great team.

Saving lives, protecting communities

NSW SES volunteers work with communities across the state to build resilience to flood, storm and tsunami. As the NSW SES prepares for more frequent and intense severe weather events, we are mobilising community members to join the team and contribute to our mission of saving lives and protecting communities.
